COMMENCEMENT ESSAYS.

An Old Resident.

During the last year at school a new arrival occurred which attracted much attention. It was an odd-looking personage and was driven up in a very antequated-looking vehicle. Having been transferred to the ground, he took a position under one of the trees, leaning against it in a most listless, disinterested sort of way.

The presence and appearance of the newcomer at once attracted notice. The boys seemed very familiar, leaning against him, making remarks, and even attempting to sit on him. Some of them went so far as to try to roll him about the grounds. Finally one of the classes was requested to make the acquaintance of the stranger, learn what they might of his antecedents, and endeavor to make things pleasant for him. They proceeded to do so and the results were quite interesting.

Once, as they were examining with curious eyes, each eager to be the first to find out some important fact concerning the new inhabitant of the playground, they were accosted by a learned-looking man, who critically scanned the stranger through his green glasses. He offered to tell us a part of the stranger's history, and from him we learned that our visitor belonged to a family by the name of Stone, and that they were one of the oldest families existing. But the most astounding thing was the story he related about the origin of the family. This is the story:

"A great many generations ago, when giants inhabited the earth, a number of these giants had a feast. In the midst of the banquet, for some reason, they fell to fighting, and after using up all the weapons at hand, they seized great pieces of plum pudding from the table and threw them at each other. These fragments of pudding were widely scattered over the surface of the country, and in the course of time they assumed permanent consistency, and as scientific men say, were petrified, which being interpreted means, became stone."

Thus this branch of the family had its origin. We were of course surprised and edified, but not quite satisfied to accept this story. Our gentle skepticism seemed to produce some impression on our informant, and in a more serious tone the learned speaker went on to refer us to the literature of the subject, and we were more astonished still to find that almost numberless volumes had been written, treating of the origin, genealogy, history and deeds of the famous families to which the stranger belonged. On referring to some of these volumes we learned to our surprise and pleasure, that the family we were now so interested in, were not foreigners but native born; in fact not a few of its members are old residents in Bloomfield.

As is usual with merit, they are almost without exception, extremely modest, burrowing out of sight, till sought out by those who appreciate modest worth, and put in offices of trust and usefulness. Some of them we learned, have long held positions of usefulness and responsibility among us, fulfilling their duties so faithfully, that in all the zeal and excitement of our yearly elections, no one has ever thought of displacing them, even in the interest of reform. In fact their unfailing presence at their posts as we pass along the streets and turn the corners, has come to be a sort of unspoken assurance that all is well.

Personal acquaintance thus begun with the newcomer, has since led to the discovery of more note-worthy details. Familiarity rendered him loquacious, and at different times he has gone on to tell us, after hinting at how matters were, before things began to be, and how things, as they now are rose from chaos; how continents slowly grew to their present form, like giant fungi.

Among other things, we were shown a map of our country, brilliant with different colored rings or belts, which he endeavored to persuade us, indicated its growth, or glacial geological formation, like the rings in the trunk of a tree.

Then our informant went on to tell how the new continent was covered by a wonderful and luxuriant growth of plant life and how all of it was suddenly buried in a great convulsion of nature, which he termed a cataclysm, and then gradually changed into coal and oil and natural gas.

There were two periods of the past which he seemed to dwell upon most fondly, that of the great monsters which he called Saurians, and the period of ice or as he termed it, the Glacial Epoch. During the first period monsters of this kind filled the land and sea, he told us. He then alluded to the finding of the remains of these huge creatures in New Jersey, indicating that the State had been a favorite haunt, perhaps their play-ground.

He described with particular care the curious eyes of these monsters, which were multiple, or so constructed that several images of the object seen, were formed in them at once, and intimated that quite likely the Saurians in this way were enabled to see more in New Jersey than many of its warmest admirers can now. The frequently seen sea-serpent along our coasts he claimed, is no myth, but a real surviving Saurian, probably endeavoring to plan a visit to the graves of his ancestors. But what was our astonishment on being told that these old Saurians had in their day reached a high grade of civilization, and were not without a literature, both of prose and poetry. Then he proceeded to rehearse a part of an ode evidently addressed by a Saurian lover to his mistress:—

I have found out a gift for my fair,
I know where the fossils abound,
Where the foot-prints of Ages declare
The birds that once walked on the ground.

O come, and in technical speech
We'll walk this Devonian Shore,
Or on some Silurian beach
We'll wander, my love, evermore.

Thou shalt see in his Jurassic tomb
The Plesiosaurus embalmed,
In his Oolitic prime, and his bloom,
Ignanodon safe and unharmed!

Then come, and never say nay,
But calm all your maidenly fears,
We'll note in one Summer's day,
The record of millions of years.

This, we were assured, was a fair specimen of a voluminous Saurian literature. There seemed a tone of sadness in dismissing these pleasant reminiscences. His graceful literary friends had left an evident impression on our narrator.

In the great Glacial Period, or the time when a huge sea of ice moved down from the North, our friend took a marked interest. It made a remarkable change in our climate, as it swept along, carrying large quantities of earthy material, breaking it up, and scattering it over the country. How cruel of those glaciers, to sunder "earthly ties" in such a cold way! We found that it was by this agency that our curious friend on the play-ground had been isolated from his native home. Although this is supposed to have happened an unlimited time ago, his mode of transportation is not unlike the latest fashion of traveling in our progressive age, for he might well claim that he had come down on a mammoth toboggan slide. His common name, Conglomerate, well suits his appearance, for at a glance we can see that his character is quite diversified, being composed of numerous elements, and by reason of the various lines he displays he looks as though somewhere in his travels he might have become entangled in a remnant of Joseph's coat.

Taking these points into consideration, the petrified plum pudding does not seem so far-fetched as it did at first. I think we will long remember with a feeling of pleasure, the fictitious, as well as the valuable truths suggested by the old Conglomerate pudding-stone in front of the school house, and calling to mind the many important facts which we have learned from it. I think we may well appreciate the meaning of the old saying

"There are sermons in Stones."

LILLIAN E. BAXTER.

A Proposal.

From earliest recollection we have heard mention of an old, old friend. It is said by some to be our earliest and latest earthly friend, one who, like the poor, is "always with us." Compared with other friends we always find the same result: they may be found wanting, this one never.

Some of us have recently had occasion to study the origin, antecedents, and uses of this friend. Now although we would never think less of anyone, because his antecedents were not exactly what they should be, for as Pope says "Worth makes the man," yet it is very satisfactory to learn that our friend has a creditable record. The greatest of men have had to do with its training and development, and it is with pride that they recognize its fitness to do credit to its training. Its education has been so eminently practical, that in its mission of usefulness it seems to have acquired the power of being at home "everywhere alike with the rich and poor."

To give a faint idea of its usefulness we will just mention a few of its good services. It first introduces us to other of our early friends; it makes our wants known before we can provide for ourselves; it gains friends for us as we grow older; it makes us acquainted with the deeds of the small and great who have been before; it reveals what is "to be;" it reveals even against our own will ourselves to others; most recently it has been disclosing to us its own history and treasures.

But while recognizing its wonderful services we have been much impressed with one fact—the way in which it is too often treated. We find that poets, philosophers and statesmen make constant and good use of it. The old masters, we discover, all treated it in a very courtly manner. Seeking constantly to ennoble it, they never abuse nor allow it to appear in an unworthy garb, and we always lay them aside with a far better idea of our friend than we had when we began. Its paths here are always pleasant, its tones musical, its associations inviting, its uses noble and its influences elevating. But as we come nearer ordinary life we notice that there are those who have never learned how properly to appreciate or use it, or knowing better mar and disfigure it, perhaps from carelessness, perhaps from willfulness.

Every day, every where, we find evidences of the harm done to it in small or great ways. We can scarcely pass daily compliments with those whom we meet but our mutual friend is mistreated on one or both sides. It is sometimes literally torn to tatters, in the most careless and heartless manner. But it is not in conversation alone that these abuses which we hope to correct are found. How astonished Addison and Steele would be at the way in which their old friend, as well as ours, for whom they had such an eminent respect, is treated in many of our periodicals. We must here, however, make a special exception of THE BLOOMFIELD CITIZEN, our home paper, for this is strangely free from the errors of the day, and in it we hope to find a useful ally. As we reach to-night a point where it becomes necessary to think of looking about a little for a sphere of usefulness, the thought has occurred to a few of us, that here is a new, unoccupied field, that to assist in doing away with the abuses against this friend would be a good work to which we might reasonably aspire.

Accordingly some of us have been quietly casting about to decide just what form our effort might best assume. The evident need of some action and the ease with which new enterprises are conceived and inaugurated in these days, has been our great encouragement. Somehow we are strongly impressed that the soil, air and associations of Bloomfield are eminently kindly to undertakings the nature of which we trust ours is.

The three branches of Fire Department, the Village Improvement Association, the Reform Club, the Law & Order League, the W. C. T. U., the Y. M. C. A., the W. A. Y. M. C. A., the Athletic Club, the European Society, the numerous Young People's Societies, the Building Association, and last, but not least the Club House, are all of recent origin, and are doing service for the people of Bloomfield. So far, however, as we could learn, none of these bodies contemplate occupying the felt want that has impressed itself so urgently upon us.

The first thing to decide upon was an appropriate name for our organization. After anxious deliberation it was unanimously voted that the name should be the Lindley Murray Club. This name we deemed singularly appropriate; for Lindley Murray had single-handed tried the same field we were about to attempt, and with great success. We hope to be able to aid in rendering his name more illustrious and in revising a few of the famous rules with which our parents and grandparents were once so familiar.

The sententious epitaph of Lindley Murray we have adopted as our motto:

"He lived and wrought, his labors were immense
But ne'er declined to prefer perfect tense."

Having observed one great weakness in all other societies—their exclusiveness—we determined that no such defect should be allowed in our society, but the membership should include all who are willing to make an effort for better things. In drawing up our constitution our chief aim was to make it as perfect as one of Lindley Murray's own rules, both in expression and provision, with by-laws of equal character. The work which we wish to accomplish is the relieving our mother tongu from its burden of abuses. Among these may be mentioned the purification of slang; the suppression of new words not yet sanctioned; the elimination of Johnsonese words in osity and ation; and the rescuing of words from improper inflections. This work you will observe covers a vast field and will no doubt require wisdom and time. Yet we are not without hope that we shall at least be able to begin a movement which shall redeem our tongue and restore it to what it was in the time of the "Father of English poetry, Chaucer," a well of poetry undefiled. Of course we are not expecting perfection at once. There will probably be offences, alike by tongue and pen, and have ordained in our constitution that each such offense shall be subject to a small fine. The fines in time will probably become a large sum and be put to public use. With the first proceeds we expect that a handsome Lindley Murray Club House will be erected. From the same source we hope to be able to provide means for the foundation of a large library of standard authors, secure a fund for annual series of lectures on our mother tongue, illustrating its origin, history, beauties, uses, etc.

Besides these means we propose to establish a system of rewards to be given as encouragement to all who display special usefulness in our work. We all know how potent timely encouragement may be made.

Thus in these ways, by constant association, by example, by a judicious system of encouragement and instruction we hope to begin a movement which shall prove worthy to take its place among the many movements that have been and are being established among us.

$5.40 WM. H. BROWN, Sheriff.
GUILD & LUM, Sol'rs.

IN CHANCERY OF NEW JERSEY.—To Martha E. Dennison, Margaret Voorhess, and Walter Voorhees.

By virtue of an order of the Court of Chancery of New Jersey, made on the day of the date hereof, in a cause wherein Charles C. Voorhees is complainant, and you and others are defendants, you are required to appear, plead, demur, or answer to the complainant's bill, on or before twenty-seventh day of July next, or the said bill will be taken as confessed against you.

The said bill is filed to obtain a decree that Margaret Voorhees and Walter Voorhees have no estate or interest in the estate of John F. Voorhees, deceased, or any part thereof, and that Theodore Little and George E. Voorhees, surviving executors of John F. Voorhees, deceased, may account for and pay over to the complainant that portion of the estate of John F. Voorhees, deceased, which would have come to Abraham Voorhees had he been living and for general relief.

And you, Martha E. Dennison, are made defendant because you are entitled to some part of the residuary estate of said John F. Voorhees; and you, Margaret Voorheos and Walter Voorhees are made defendants because you claim to have some interest in the residuary estate of said John F. Voorhees as children of Abraham Voorhees, deceased, and because it is alleged in said bill that if you are children of the said Abraham Voorhees you are illegitimate children and not entitled to any share in said estate and because a decree is prayed for that you have no interest in the estate of said John F. Voorhees, deceased.
